15-Rights and Permissions

Copyright law is an extremely complex field so this document should be understood as what it is, a basic summarised guide. Any decisions to include materials without rights or permissions should come after a full perusal of some of the references in this guide or wherever possible, after taking expert legal advice.

1. All works that have a basic minimum degree of originality are copyrighted automatically from the moment they take on a tangible form and all rights associated with copyright belong to the creator of the work. While further procedures, such as registering copyright, are available for added protection, they are not required to ensure copyright.
2. Cambridge Scholars Publishing (hereafter CSP) in most cases requires the exclusive rights to publish and sell (make copies and distribute) the work, but all other copyrights remain with the author. For example, the right to make derivative works (translations, dramatisations, and so forth) are not affected.
3. Requesting permissions for the inclusion of materials whose copyright is not owned by the author is the author's responsibility, as is ensuring that all necessary requirements of the copyright holder are observed, such as including an appropriate caption or acknowledgement. In most cases, permission is granted for a specific publication and the materials cannot be used elsewhere.
4. Form F5-Rights and Permissions should be filled in and submitted to CSP if a work has more than one inclusion of externally copyrighted materials.
5. All permissions should be obtained in writing. Email or letter are both acceptable.
6. It is not necessary to obtain permissions where the inclusion of materials can be adequately described as 'fair use', a fairly full discussion of which is available in Section 4.51 of the Chicago Manual of Style, 14th Edition.
7. For a sample permissions request, see document S3-Sample Permissions Request.
